Purpose & Scope

The purpose of this lexicon, more informative than definitive, is to provide a convenient Internet-accessible source for space and electronic warfare terms, acronyms, abbreviations, and related reference material for use by those who have an interest in such information. ( Of late, I have included various other material which I have discovered and deemed to be of possible interest to users of this site. This material includes a summary of naval signal flags, International Morse Code, a Cold War civil defense manual, and even a World War I song book. ) The glossary contains terms used in Electronic Warfare (EW), Command, Control, Communications, & Intelligence (C<sup>3</sup>I), and related fields, and also terms related to emerging technologies relating to space, EW and other areas having military implications such as the Internet and non-lethal weaponry. Sources includes the "Department of Defense Dictionary of Military and Associated Terms," Joint Pub 1-02, 1 December 1989 (formerly JCS Pub 1) as well as additional terminology introduced by the Chairman of the Joint Chief of Staff in his Memorandum of Policy (MOP) 30 and the unclassified APPENDIX B from MOP 6, the unclassified APPENDIX B from MOP 6. Many terms and abbreviations come from DoD's Militarily Critical Technologies List (MCTL), published every few years. However, the bulk of the terms and acronyms come from technical periodicals and, in some cases, relevant web sites (these are cited in the Bibliography.) The Lexicon originally contained only written definitions, internally cross-referenced, but the power of the Internet has allowed me to include numerous hyperlinks to related web sites, as well as to diagrams and sound tracks associated with some of the terms. Because of the rising interest and DoD involvement in the field of Nonlethal Warfare, which includes various types of electronic/acoustic devices, I have decided to address that area as well. Photographs and video clips will be used when available. I hope that visitors to this site who have access to such enhancements will contribute to the lexicon so that it can achieve its potential as a comprehensive, useful, and interesting source of information for both researchers and casual browsers. Finally, although I review the links from time to time, the dynamics of the Web will result in some disappointment when encountering a discontinued link. If you encounter such a problem (or any other situation needing correction), please notify me via e-mail, and I will attend to the problem immediately by locating the new URL, or, failing that, removing the link.

CRITERIA FOR INCLUDING TERMS, ACRONYMS & ABBREVIATIONS IN THE LEXICON

GLOSSARY STRUCTURE

SOURCES

Top of Page

Criteria for Including Terms, Acronyms, and Abbreviations in the Lexicon

Not generally included in a standard English dictionary.

Of general significance to space and electronic warfare, military technology or emerging technologies.

Used in dialogue, part of the jargon, or found in recent professional literature pertaining to space & electronic warfare, military technology, C<sup>3</sup>I, computers, the Internet, weaponry, and related fields.

In addition to terminology, this site contains "EXCURSION" links to information of historical interest (e.g., period from 1913 through the 1960s).

Glossary Structure

The structure of the glossary is as follows:

(1) Entries in the glossary are arranged alphabetically, ignoring spaces and non-alphanumeric characters.

(2) If a term has more than one definition, or is defined in more than one source, the various definitions are listed with numerical prefixes. Definitions from multiple sources are included only when they differ sufficiently to provide additional insight.

(3) Many definitions have accompanying examples or explanatory notes.

(4) When appropriate, the following cross-reference expressions are used to show a term's relationship to other terms in the glossary.

(a) Contrast with refers to a term with an opposite or substantially different meaning.

(b) Synonymous with refers to a synonymous term.

(c) See refers the reader to a preferred synonymous term, which introduces the definition.

(d) See also refers to a related term.

(e) Hyperlinks are shown as blue underlined text, and are used liberally to allow immediate access to cited terms.

Sources

Brackets [] following a definition contain a citation to the source for that definition. If more than one source defines a term, the definition from the source highest on the list shown below is used. A few definitions appearing in this Glossary are abridged or are substantially paraphrased to reduce complexity and save space (these are marked by an asterisk ( * ) in the source citation). Specific editions or articles within principal sources are indicated by a number following a colon in the brackets (e.g., "[4:3]"). The bibliography lists all of these citations. The principal sources are:
